ENERGY POLICY

Hogshead Spouter Co. believes the United States does not need "zero foreign oil imports" to be energy independent.

There is no reason to end oil imports from Canada and Mexico. Energy independence is not about protectionism. Energy independence does not mean closed borders or economic isolation. Instead, energy independence can be achieved by producing abundant and affordable alternative transportation fuels through advanced technology that will enable all countries to do the same.

Combining traditional oil and gas with renewable, sustainable energy from resource and waste sets us on the road to permanent energy independence by reducing dependence on foreign energy and strengthening national security.
